CHAPTER 1

INTRODUCTION

Homoeopathy¹ is a medical discipline whose primary emphasis is that, it is a non-invasive form of therapeutics. It is a low cost, safe therapeutic system employing exclusively non-toxic remedies. It may be used to treat both acute and chronic disorders. However, its greatest utility lies in its successful treatment of many chronic illnesses that are usually difficult to manage with other therapeutic methods.

The discipline of homoeopathy, essentially entails a holistic approach towards the sick person and treats the patient's disturbances on the emotional, mental and physical levels in an integrated manner. Its basic aim is to bring back the lost equilibrium of the sick individual at all these three levels, by stimulating and strengthening his intrinsic defence and curative mechanisms (the so called vital forces).

Homoeopathy, when introduced by the celebrated German physician, Samuel Hahnemann, through his scholarly work, The Organon of the Art of Healing (which was first published in 1810 A.D.), was a revolutionary method. The implications of this new modality were, for the medical profession of his time, as revolutionary as quantum mechanics or relativity theory were to Newtonian physics in this century. Controversy has lasted for the past two centuries and is still continuing today.

CHAPTER 2

THE HISTORY

THE HOMOEOPATHIC PRINCIPLE

"In order to discover the true curative powers of a remedy to treat diseases, one must ascertain the specific artificial disorder it develops in the healthy human body, and then utilize it to treat similar morbid conditions. In order to radically cure certain chronic diseases, one must search for the single remedy which may evoke a similar disease picture; the closer the similarity the better. Hitherto, diseases of the human organism were treated neither rationally nor on logical principles, but according to various esoteric, hypothetical, curative paradigms, among which is the palliative rule: contraria contrariis curentur. The truth is in fact, diametrically opposite; to cure mildly, rapidly and permanently, in every disorder, select the remedy which produces a similar clinical picture—similia similibus curentur. This is the fundamental principle of homoeopathy (known as the 'Law of Cure')"

— Hahnemann.

Homoeopathy was founded as a viable alternative to conventional medical methods of his day, by the celebrated German physician, Christian Samuel Freidrich Hahnemann, at the beginning of the 19th century. Increasingly concerned about the dangers and complications caused by the crude physical methods employed in the therapeutics of his day and,

and the patient, thus establishing a bioenergetic homeostasis. Moratherapy is given using the patient's own electrical oscillations. The Mora unit does not generate oscillations itself; it amplifies and inverts the patient's own bioelectric oscillations. The equipment receives the patient's oscillations using a number of methods, usually by a pair of hand-held electrodes. This information is fed into the input jack of the equipment. The signal is then amplified and transmitted into the patient in a mirror image inverted wave form.

One of the most curious phenomena seen in Moratherapy is the ability to transmit energetic 'imprints' to or from a patient, or from homoeopathic remedies. What the nature of this energetic imprint is, or what type of energy is, in fact transmitted, is still obscure.

Mora basic therapy produces satisfactory clinical results, especially in disorders associated with autonomic dysfunction such as bronchial asthma, irritable bowel syndrome, eczemas, allergies, hyperhidrosis, peptic ulcer, circulatory disorders and so on. The search for the remedy is greatly simplified by the simultaneous use of a homoeopathic radio transmitter (sender) and receiver. The phenomena involved by this application of homoeopathy opens up a vast potential for bioenergetic medicines. The concept that the energetic component of any remedy may be transmitted through space and time via electromagnetic waves acting as a carrier frequency, is a unique and exciting concept.

The homoeopathic electromagnetic transmitter (sender) and the receiver of Moratherapy, is an application which works effectively and consistently. The transmitter is placed over the remedies to be tested and it picks their energy via a brass plate fixed at the bottom of the unit. This is then picked up by the receiver and transmitted into the measurement unit. The maximum distance between the sender and the receiver depending, of course, on the power of the unit is generally about 20 to 30 meters. This innovation is most useful because it saves a great deal of time during the diagnostic procedure. Hundreds of remedies may be scanned in a relatively short period, thus eliminating the need to repertorise a long list of possible remedies.

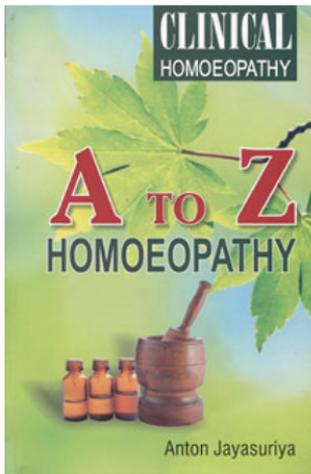

Mora Colour Therapy is another method of treatment. It is a modern innovation of colour therapy, which has been used since ancient times to treat illness. The light in the Mora Colour Therapy unit originates in a broad spectrum lamp. It is fitted with three colour filters (red, yellow and blue, the three primary colours). Combinations of these three primary colours also produce the colours violet, orange and green. These six colours are used therapeutically via electromagnetic oscillations linked to the patiënt (colour is not directly irradiated on the patiënt).

Indumed therapy attempts to correct the adverse influence of geopathic environmental stress. The field strengths used in Indumed therapy are close to that of the earth's field (about 0.4 gauss). This intensity is a million times less than intensities used in conventional magnetic field devices; therefore Indumed therapy is in the homoeopathic mode. The pulsed character of the input in Indumed therapy is characterised by micropulses of about one millisecond duration. Each pulse has a steep rise followed by a rapid drop, producing harmonic frequencies of up to 6MHz. The wide harmonic pattern of any therapeutic energetic input is of major importance as it is well known that oscillation spectra in natural biological flora and fauna have a broad harmonic spectrum.

The Vegatest was also developed by Helmut Schimmel, a West German oral surgeon, in the 1970's. He had been using Electro-acupuncture according to Voll (EAV) for many years. He found it was inordinately time consuming and exhausting for both the physician and the patiënt. He experimented with a homoeopathic test ampule rather than with a particular acupuncture point as the target of the test. Any suitable acupuncture point may be chosen, preferably a Jing-Well point of a finger or toe. A test ampule made from, for example, pancreas (by convention the D4 potency is usually employed in the Vegatest method) is placed in the electrical fields of the measuring device, the so-called honeycomb. The point is measured again, and if the final reading is lower than the control reading (before the pancreas ampoule was placed in the circuit) then it indicates that the pancreas of that patiënt is probably stressed. Using Electro-acupuncture according to Voll (EAV), command measurement points, would have to be carefully measured to obtain like information.

The body's electrical homeostatic mechanisms are indeed very efficient, according to Schimmel, to the extent of electrically correcting and making up for, even advanced pathology. Schimmel, therefore, proposed that it would be better to electrically stress the patiënt prior to these measurements. The stress then reveals the deficiencies more clearly.
